this dissertation explores three critical aspects of the u s retail food industry food safety concerns consumers access to healthy food and consumer preferences of product attributes the first chapter develops a product differentiation model with exogenous residential sorting and empirically tests whether low income areas are more likely to be exposed to the bacterium listeria monocytogenes in grocery store delis using data on the prevalence of listeria monocytogenes collected from grocery store delis i find that the marginalized communities in the u s are in high food safety risk i argue that a store s census tract income is useful in predicting prevalence of l monocytogenes and thus low income status should be considered as a risk factor the second chapter utilizes machine learning models random forests to identify the factors that predict the access to healthy food in u s retail markets i identify two binary measures from the modified retail food environment index food deserts tracts where no healthful food retailers exist and food swamps where healthful food retailers are outnumbered by unhealthy ones my model optimally identifies ten demographic variables that detect food deserts and food swamps with prediction accuracy of 100 in sample and 72 out of sample thus i argue that this model can be used to get a sensible prediction of access to healthful food retailers for any u s census tract results also suggest that food deserts and food swamps are intrinsically different and require separate policy attention the third chapter analyzes consumers valuations of apple attributes using a discrete choice framework by combining retail scanner data with sensory panels i estimate own and cross price elasticities of 21 open and club apple varieties my findings suggest that consumers are consistent over time in their tastes for apple attributes and rank them in the order of firmness sweetness juiciness crispness aroma and acidity consumers of club apples are loyal to their choices they may pay higher prices but are less likely to switch an open variety on the other hand open varieties are less expensive and traditionally occupy greater retail shelf space but are easily substitutable in case of price increase indonesia s food market has changed in response to a changing and growing economy the report examines changes in the food consumption pattern and measures the growth of modern food retail chains packaged food purchases and food imports in the world s fourth most populous country the evidence suggests that indonesians are moving toward modern global purchasing and consumption patterns but more slowly than in some comparable countries barriers to foreign and domestic commerce affecting the development of modern food retail supply chains are important constraints on food market change in indonesia further change in indonesia s retail food sector will help determine future growth in imports including from the united states currently there is no one book or textbook that covers all aspects of retail food safety it is becoming apparent that a number of issues relating to retail food safety have come to the forefront in some jurisdictions of late for example a recent usda risk assessment has pointed out that issues occurring at usa retail appear to be critical in terms of contamination of deli meat as well a large listeriosis outbreak in quebec pointed to retail cross contamination as a key issue in terms of sanitation a number of advances have been made but these have not all been synthesized together in one chapter with a focus on retail in addition the whole area of private standards and the global food safety initiative gfsi have come to the forefront of late and these as well will be explored in great detail other aspects related to the safety of important food commodities such as seafood meat produce and dairy will also be discussed and salient areas addressed
